Dear Mr. Michael Murphy,

There's a dilemma centering around your stores and gas stations. I'm not the only one that has noticed either. I checked out the reviews about many of your locations and the problems seem to permeate the lot of them.

My major complaint is that there's a huge discrepancy with prices of the gas from station to station. One cannot rely on your company maintaining any sense or order or trustworthiness in finding similar prices from town to town. Please explain why the prices vary significantly within the same state! Are the stores individually owned so the owners can choose their own prices?

I would appreciate a response please.

Sincerely,

XXXX

Dear Mr. Holiday,

Thank you for your quick response to my query about gas price differences at different QuickCheks in my area during the same day. I must admit it was an interesting take on the subject and albeit there's probably some truth to it. However, since I know people who have worked at gas stations I suggest there is more. So your answer may have been incomplete. Is that true? It's my feeling that there are undertones of deception and secrets that you don't wish the public to know; a bit of hiding some of the truth so you're not telling the WHOLE truth?

Is it true, for instance, that the more affluent a town is the higher the price of gas is in that particular town based somewhat on its affluence? Of course it is. It's so obvious a 10 year old can see it. What's the reason for that?

The gas prices have not been that volatile in the past year or more so you can't use that as a reason now. All your answers do not add up to the whole reason or reasons. I've already asked a couple of additional questions within this letter and I'll ask this again now too.

Why such a wide range of pricing at QuickCheks within such a small circumference of space of just a few miles or at the town right next door?

Just so you're aware – this kind of beating around the bush; keeping the public guessing about your whys drives us away as patrons. The American people have become smarter in more recent years about this kind of thing. When we get incomplete answers it just confirms our suspicions about not being able to trust big business.

No doubt you will circumvent all this and decide I'm not worth dealing with. That's your choice but I know a lot of people and the best advertisement is still word of mouth.

Very Truly Yours,

XXXX
